

Speck on the Globe

A freckled girl's account of her wanderlust, one spot at a time

Speck on the globe is a travel blog that highlights the stories of a solo women traveler hoping to inspire others to explore different countries and cultures, while learning more about themselves. My focus is slow and sustainable travel practices, I think it's paramount to have the opportunity to explore and leave only a positive impact. I have freckled the globe looking for opportunities to engage with others in new environments and to gain insight on the world around me while sharing experiences and making new friends. With a degree in journalism, I enjoy focusing on personal interest stories while including history and education. My main focus usually consists of a more responsible tourism choice, incorporating wildlife education, sustainable tourism and volunteer opportunities in new locales.

I moved from out of the office at the end of 2012 shifting towards a remote access job, which enabled me to pursue my travel aspirations. My mentality has been slow travel, focusing on immersion rather than quick tours. I have been on the road full time since then, I've driven thousands of miles, flown countless times visiting over fifty countries on four continents all while working, volunteering and writing. I'm happy my adventure is still continuing and I love sharing it with others!
